For fun...

I think that most people are not interested in parking itself. So I've tried to convince them that parking is important for what really interests them, which may be affordable housing or climate change or traffic congestion or fuel consumption or accidents or health or whatever.

And I think that's why people are beginning to pay attention to parking – because they can see it's perhaps the easiest way to make improvements in what they're concerned about. Whatever the concern, I think the most politically feasible and most cost-effective way to advance the cause is often to fix parking.
