What is a Notice to Comply or Vacate?

Under Washington state law, a landlord must provide a tenant with a written ten day notice to comply or vacate before starting a court proceeding for eviction based upon a tenant not following the rental agreement, lease, or other rules and regulations applying to the tenancy. In other words, a notice to comply or vacate is informing the tenant that the landlord believes the tenant has not met their obligations of the tenancy and now must take steps to fix the issues or the landlord can start the eviction process. To be valid, a notice to comply or vacate must inform the tenant of the specific rental agreement terms or rules that the tenant has not followed. The notice must also inform the tenant of which actions the tenant can take to cure the problems alleged in the notice.

Can the Landlord Enforce Rules I Didn't Know About?

In order for a notice to comply or vacate to be valid, the problem alleged by the landlord must be a tenant obligation listed in the rental agreement or lease. If you have an oral agreement, then both the landlord and tenant had to agree to the rule of obligation. If you have any question whether the notice to comply or vacate is valid, consult your lease or rental agreement. If you have difficulty interpreting the language of your lease or rental agreement, consult one of the resources listed at the end of this information sheet.

What if I Fix the Problem Within Ten Days?

A notice to comply or vacate gives a tenant ten days to fix whatever obligation the tenant is not keeping. If a tenant fixes the problem within ten days, then the landlord cannot move forward with an eviction. If you fix the issue, notify the landlord that the problem has been corrected and keep whatever documentation you have to show you fixed the problem. Under Washington state law, a notice to comply or vacate expires after sixty (60) days. That means even if you fix the problem within ten days to save your tenancy, you must also make sure the problem does not happen again in the next few months.
